We have dedicated forum for PC.A recent TED talk might indicate just how serious Nintendo's newfound interest in the craft of making videogames truly is. A while ago, Miyamoto revealed how he aimed for a level of complexity in Zelda: Breath of the Wild that is equal to "making soap." When he meant soap, he meant soap. He meant something complex, that is, and not a tchotchke you can make in minutes. The idea that Nintendo could now make games like they make soap has been met with a lot of bewilderment. How can you make a game like soap? It's a stupid question. Of course you can! What else are videogames made of? This is the closest thing to genius in videogame history. The best part of this talk is that it shows just how much Nintendo has learned about making games. After all, if they can make something as complicated as soap in a game that is as simple as that, imagine what they can do in a game that is as complex as a human being. Miyamoto's talk will make you reassess your entire philosophy on the medium. He shows that there's a lot more to games than the standard framework of making enemies and solving puzzles. It's not just about defeating the bad guys and solving the "puzzle" of how to find the reward. There's so much more to it that most people don't realize. A lot of people think that Miyamoto made the

Zelda series simply for the money. In this talk, it's clear that he understands the importance of simplicity in making great games. In explaining the philosophy behind this
