The effects of confluence on the expression of newly identified genes in transformed epithelial cells of the renal proximal tubule. To investigate the effects of cell-cell contact on the expression of epithelial cell-specific genes, murine LLC-PK1 cells were grown on Transwell filters for 10 days. Subconfluent and confluent LLC-PK1 cells were mixed to form heterokaryons and the resulting cell mixture was subjected to cDNA microarray analysis. The expression of 68 genes, predominantly localized in the distal nephron, was significantly changed by confluency. These genes were classified into two types. The first type was genes whose expression was decreased in confluent cells. The second type was genes whose expression increased in confluent cells. As the expression of many genes, such as SCaC1 and TJP1, were highly increased in confluent cells when compared to the levels in subconfluent cells, we decided to focus on these genes. Real-time PCR analysis revealed that the expression of SC 570a42141b
